Zoo 5 (or is it as a Daddy?)

Hi.

I work at a domestic violence shelter. This is freaking awesome the vast majority of the time (though, of course, I would ultimately like to be out of a job). The only thing that even remotely sucks about this job is that every other weekend I work a 19-hour overnight shift. This leaves me with a lot of time on my hands, assuming that the crisis line and house are fairly quiet. I would do homework or read, but I'm not in school anymore and I can't really read for more than 5 or 6 hours at a ~~time~~ so I'm going to compile some random thoughts and images into a zine. This is a one-sheet published twice a month. I'm listening to K.D. Lang's Shadowland while I make it; you should listen to that as you read it. Enjoy.

This need for aloneness may be hard on my friends or my community, but I think it's healthy and necessary. My ex needed all the time and energy that I didn't put into work, school, community projects, or friends. I had nothing left for myself. I don't even know what I like anymore. I'm going to get to know myself again. I've given myself until next spring until I'll let myself worry about whether or not I should be dating or having sex. I'm going to get involved in things I care about again. Getting this job was the point at which I realized that it was time to take my life back into my own hands. ♡

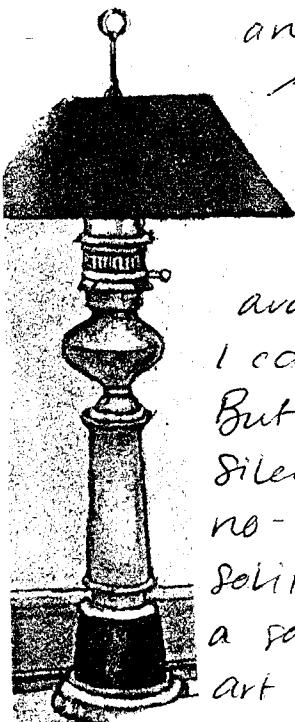

I even smile like that, baby.

Smiling Alone in my Room

I'm beginning to like silence and solitude again. As a kid, I spent nearly all my time alone. Sometimes my caretakers thought I was autistic because I played games in my head for hours. Then I found people who weren't mean. After that I found a real community. I've spent the last few years surrounded by loud, exciting, wonderful activity. Then my ex and I split and I found myself all alone.

At first it was really scary; I sought out company at all times, had music on when there was no one else available, and slept as much as I could to chase away the fear. But lately I've been craving silence—not total silence, but no-humans-around silence—and solitude. I made my room into a safe haven. I've been making art and writing and reading.

things I've done in the last 2 weeks...

- decided not to freak out when I didn't get any sort of response to the loveish letters I sent a couple weeks ago.
- moved into a new house and got my room set up in a very sanctuary-like manner.
- found out that my mom had to put my 17-year-old dog to sleep.
- went on a date?
- ate way too much ice cream.
- forgave someone.
- got soaked to the bone waiting next to the dumpster for pizza in the rain for an hour.

I recently realized that I've lost my sense of wonder with the world. I blame it on having ^{Why can't I touch the} mostly a broken heart and school loans to pay off. But it's no excuse, really.

Wonders never cease

I just ~~not~~ kind of shut myself off to the magic of the world, and started being pessimistic and cynical all the time. Well, fuck that. This time is the start of a reawakening of the magic in me. I'm going to start taking pictures again and take a ceramics class at the art center when I'm ~~do~~ I get some cash. I'm going to ~~snowflakes come from~~ get my oboe out of storage and relearn how to play it and start a band with every single one of my but then he made me realize ANDERSON what counts as a date, or love for that matter. I've never dated anyone seriously. I've never loved someone without having sex. I'm realizing that there are a million ways to be with another person. When he Douglas LEAVENWORTH CHISON said it could be a date, I nearly panicked; I had finally come to a place where I felt like I understood everything and could classify and categorize everything, and he just kind of broke all my structures with an offhand phrase. So now I'm working on just taking things as they are and enjoying them without trying to understand and label them. I'm trying to accept love in all its forms. ♡ getting coffee and the barista told us that she recognized us from when we were in BROWN

there before and asked us how our night was going. She clearly thought we were on a date. We were both dressed up a little, coincidentally, and we played chess. We had a really nice time. When we went to get ice cream, I brought up the barista and laughed, but he said it could have been a date - a date could be anything with anyone. Friends could go on dates. It kind of rattled me. I've wanted to date him and came to peace with the fact that I never would.

friends in it. I'm going to start doodling in my sketch book all the time again. Why can't I touch the sky? I'm going to start making my own clothes and selling homemade clothes for all sizes of people. I'll finally do that genital mutilation info project with my cunt pillows. I'll go to more shows and art exhibits and museums. I got so involved in school and work and being in a committed relationship and doing activist work that I forgot how to fully live.

Too Busy Being Blige

It's been six months since my relationship with my former partner ended, and I'm just now getting to the functional level again.

I think that's probably alright since we were together for 2½ years. But now that I'm functional again, I may have to think about the possibility of dating.

When I was a fucked up mess, I didn't have to worry about anyone wanting anything from me, but now that I've got my shit together I run the risk of being attractive to other people. I had an accidentally datelike experience a couple nights ago and it was nice. I have another possibly datelike experience in a couple days.

It helps that both the other people involved in these datelike experiences are seeing other people not interested in seriously dating me and the
